Shot Down in Somalia

On October 3, 1993, Chief Warrant Officer Michael Durant was sent on the most dangerous mission of his life. A brutal warlord named Mohammed Farah Aidid was trying to seize control of Somalia (suh-MAHL-yuh), a country in East Africa. American forces, however, were determined to stop him. Michael was a U.S. Army helicopter pilot. His mission was to fly U.S. Army Rangers into the heart of Somalia's capital, Mogadishu (maw-guh-DEE-shoo), so that they could try to capture Aidid.

Michael Durant was flying a helicopter called a Black Hawk. This kind of aircraft is specially designed to carry small groups of soldiers to hard-to-reach places.

After Michael flew the soldiers into the city, a fierce battle broke out between the Americans and Aidid's men. Michael was flying just 75 feet (23 m) over the city streets when an enemy rocket-propelled grenade (RPG) hit the tail of his helicopter. The aircraft spun wildly out of control and slammed down into the street.

Somalia is the easternmost country on the mainland of Africa.

Captured!

Michael lay in the cockpit of his crumpled Black Hawk. He was in terrible pain. Bones in his back and in one of his legs were broken. Bullets were flying all around, and bombs exploded nearby. Two soldiers rushed over to help him out of his helicopter. Before they could rescue him, however, enemy fighters charged up to Michael and grabbed him. Michael Durant was now a prisoner of war.

Michael's worst fears were coming true. Still, he had known that something like this could happen at any time—and he had accepted the risk. Michael had one of the toughest jobs in the U.S. Army. He was a pilot for a special unit known as the Night Stalkers.

The battle that Michael fought in became known as the Battle of Mogadishu. Eighteen U.S. soldiers were killed and 84 were wounded, but Aidid was not captured.
